In these volumes see entries for Gen. Don Carlos Buell, Marcellus Jerome Clark, William Davison, Col. John H. McHenry, Capt. Preston Morton, Dr. John Edward Pendleton and other veterans listed.

In the volume, Ohio County, Kentucky Obituary Index, 1873-1899, the following Civil War veterans were named. This is not a complete list of all veterans in this volume only those that the newspaper article reference their service in the Civil War. Death notices of other veterans not listed below were published in the newspapers. However, those notices contained no reference to their service. The military service of the following veterans was referred to in the newspapers. In a few instances the same individual may be duplicated due to variations in the spelling of his name.

Hartford Herald, Hartford, Ky., 27 July 1898, p1:

QUANTRELL'S RAID
IN OHIO COUNTY IN THE WINTER OF 1864

Another Version of the Notorious Guerrilla's Work Near Hartford.
How He Murdered His Victims.

A writer in the Courier-Journal¹ gives the following account of Quantrell's raid in Ohio county:

The statement attributed to Frank James, while in Harrodsburg a short while ago, that Quantrell and his noted guerrilla band killed twenty Federal soldiers near Hartford, Ky., during his famous raid in Kentucky, has caused considerable comment, and has met with numerous contradictions. Men familiar with the case say that only three men were killed by Quantrell's band near Hartford. One of the Federal soldiers, who met death at the guerilla's hands was Lieut. Andrew M. Barnett, a brother of Mr. Cicero M. Barnett, Surveyor of Customs in Louisville, and chairman of the Republican State Central Committee, whose home is at Hartford. A man who knows the circumstances thus told the story:

"It was in the winter of 1864, I think. Andrew M. Barnett, who, although only 20 years of age, was First Lieutenant in the Union army, had returned to his home near Hartford for a short while to recruit for the Federal army. While at home, Quantrell and his band of some seventy-five men, including the James boys—though it was not learned that the James boys were with them until the James boys' memoirs came out years afterward - arrived at Hartford. They were disguised as Union soldiers and said they were hunting Southern guerrillas. They sent out to the Barnett home for the young Lieutenant, requesting that he, as a Federal soldier and comrade, pilot them across the country,

"Lieutenant Barnett consented to act as guide for the men whom he thought were friends, and John Townsley and Watt Lawton, two other Federal soldiers, insisted upon going, too, They all rode out of town together,

"The band hanged Townsley with a bridle about five miles from town and cut the throat of the mare he rode.

"A little further on they shot Lawton and left him lying wounded in the road. He died shortly afterwards.

"Lieutenant Barnett's time came when they had got about twenty miles from town. A member of the band rode up and shot him in the head. When they had killed the Lieutenant they took his watch and clothes and threw his body into a pond beside the road. The next day, his body was found frozen in the ice that had formed in the pond. In the memoirs of the James boys it is said that the members of the band cast lots to select the man who should do the shooting, and that the task fell to Frank James."

From Ohio county the band passed through Breckinridge and Meade and finally reached Nelson county, where they were surrounded by some Union soldiers and Quantrell was shot.

Page 3 of the same issue: The story printed on the first page of the Herald to-day about Quantrell's raid through Ohio county in 1864 is substantially correct, with exception that there were only three and not twenty men killed. The tree on which Townsley was hung is still standing on the Hawesville road, about five miles northeast of Hartford. It is dead, however, having had brush burned around it. Lawton was shot about four miles further on. It is not known whether Barnett witnessed the killing of his comrades or not, but it is supposed that he at least knew of it, if he did not see it, as his murder was postponed till the last. The two other Federal soldiers mentioned left the crowd before the killing commenced.

Rebel guerrilla stormed western Kentucky

By Glenn Hodges

On New Year's Day 1862, William Clarke Quantrill's gang of Confederate guerrillas crossed the Mississippi River just north of Memphis, Tenn.

and in federal blue uniforms and posing as a non-existent Union cavalry unit.

Some historians said their plan was to go east by way of Kentucky and Maryland to Washington, D. C., where they would kill Abraham Lincoln and revive the hopes of the Confederacy.

Quantrill's men, who included future notables Jim Yeager and Frank James, had fought in Missouri during the first three years of the Civil War. The group was notorious for their raid on Lawrence, Kan., in August 1861, when they killed 182 men and boys and burned the anti-slavery town to the ground.

Once into Kentucky they rode through Mayfield and Edyville, and then advanced through Hopkinsville and Greenville.

Riding toward the Ohio River, they cut a bloody swath through Muhlenberg and Ohio counties, leaving a trail littered with atrocities.

They crossed Green River near Paradise where, according to one historian, they systematically cut the throats of 14 Union soldiers who they tricked into accompanying them.

Another reported victim was Thomas Davis, a resident of northern Hopkins County, whose body was found in the woods along the Greenville-Hopkinsville Road in eastern Muhlenberg County. He had been shot through the head at close range.

William Quantrill

bicentennial

Quantrill identified himself as "Capt. Clarke" and his 37 troopers as the Fourth Missouri Cavalry, and said they had come east to hunt guerrillas. Col. Quinlan Shanks, Judge C.J. Lawton and some other unsuspecting Union officers bought the story, and recommended 23-year-old Lt. Andrew Barnett to lead "Clarke's" unit.

Barnett was home in Ohio County on recruiting duty when the guerrillas came to his family's house at No Creek to ask for help.

Wat Lawton, a Union soldier in an Indiana regiment, also was in Hartford at the time visiting his family, but was afraid to return to Evansville because of the numerous gangs of guerrillas prowling the county. Quantrill told Lawton that his troops were going to the Ohio River and that he should ride north with them.

Quantrill's riders left Hartford on the bitter cold Monday morning, accompanied by Barnett, Lawton and another Union officer Isaac Axton. The road followed the route of what is today Kentucky 170 and Kentucky 1814.

A few minutes into the trip, Axton became suspicious of Quantrill's men and told them he was going back to get a pair of grated pistols and would catch up later. Unable to alert Lt. Barnett and Lawton of his suspicions, Axton rode straight to the home of Joe Barnett, Lt. Barnett's father, and told him he believed "Clarke's men" to be Confederate guerrillas.

The elder Barnett then sent his hired man, William Townsley, to warn Andrew.

Expecting it was Axton returning, the rear guard of Quantrill's force stopped Townsley, and hanged him three miles from Hartford on the Haversville Road. His body was

'A Hundred Miles, A Hundred Heartbreaks' By Ohio County Author

"My heart has been broken a hundred times in a hundred miles, but oh! the gallantry of my men."

These words were spoken by the leader of the 17th Kentucky Regiment during the War Between the States are vividly brought to life in John Blackburn's new Civil War book, "A Hundred Miles, A Hundred Heartbreaks."

Blackburn, an author with a keen and abiding interest in the Civil War, was born in McHenry and has lived in Ohio County most of his life. Author of the earlier, "Grey Jackets with Blue Collars", Blackburn has earned the respect of historians across the United States.

"A Hundred Miles, A Hundred Heartbreaks" is the result of more than nine years of travel and research to insure authenticity. In visiting actual sites of events, combing miles of often rugged terrain and little-known and nearly-forgotten cemeteries, the author has literally left no stone unturned to glean accurate and reliable information for this work.

While Blackburn factually exploits the military missions of the gallant 17th Regiment, the real guts of the new book comes with the realism with which he describes the lives of common soldiers...what they ate, the songs they sang, and the emotion they felt before going into the agony of such great battles as Donelson, Shiloh and Chickamauga.

Blackburn's "A Hundred Miles, A Hundred Heartbreaks" is a stirring story of the 17th Regiment during this nation's bitterest struggle and it is written in a manner which makes you feel you were there.

The book tells how the regiment was formed in Owensboro after the outbreak of the war and was immediately moved to Hartford.

From Hartford, the book relates, the regiment engaged in a conflict at Morganfield where the first Kentucky soldier was killed on his native soil.

The regiment then traveled to Calhoun where it stayed for several months before joining General Grant at Paducah. Besides the aforementioned battles, the regiment also marched with General Sherman from Chattanooga to Atlanta.

The book contains more than 300 pages of documented Civil War history and 25 illustrations. It is completely indexed.

Blackburn is himself a veteran, having served in the European theatre during World War II. He was twice decorated (Bronze Star) for gallantry in action. He is a member of the Filson Club of Louisville, the Kentucky Historical Society, and a much sought after public speaker.

The author now makes his home in Fordsville and is accepting orders for the new book.
